PEOPLE FEATURE | JUNE 2025

AFFC: You've worn many hats; model, actress, entrepreneur, and mom. How would you describe the woman Faith Morey is today?

FAITH : Today, I would describe myself as a woman who has come into her own; anchored in purpose, refined by experience, and driven by service. I've journeyed through the glamorous world of fashion and the demanding terrain of entrepreneurship, but at my core, I remain deeply grounded by my identity as a mother and a woman who believes in giving back. The evolution of Faith Morey has been shaped not only by ambition but by intention. Every chapter—whether walking international runways, navigating motherhood, launching businesses, or championing educational access through the Okachi Charity Foundation—has refined me with grace, discipline, and empathy.

I am a woman who leads with her values, who embraces both power and tenderness, and who understands that true success is not only what you achieve, but what you're able to give to the world.

AFFC: Looking back at your early years in Nigeria, what parts of your upbringing have shaped your strength and resilience the most?

FAITH: Growing up in Nigeria instilled in me a kind of strength that can't be taught in books. It's lived, it's endured, and it becomes part of your DNA. I was raised by women of immense dignity and discipline, especially my grandmother, who often reminded me that "integrity is better than money, and a good name will take you places wealth cannot." My early years taught me to value hard work, humility, and self-worth. Attending public schools in Port Harcourt without privilege but full of potential taught me how to rise with grace even in the absence of comfort. I learned to make do, to persevere, and to dream beyond my circumstances.

Motherhood refined me in ways no runway or boardroom ever could. It made me softer, stronger, more intentional.
